Answers. This is a classic conservation of momentum problem. Because the entire system (bee on stick) is initially at rest, anything the bee does is an internal force and therefore needs to cancel out in order for the system to continue having zero momentum. Define:  $m = \text{mass of bee} = 0.175\text{g}$   $M = \text{mass of stick} = 4.85\text{g}$   $v = \text{bee velocity} = \dots$

Ideally, an individual at the end of life should be comfortable and free of any distressing symptoms and signs. But the transition to death, like the beginning of life, is hard work. Just as a woman's body knows how to give birth, the human body knows instinctively how to die, but it doesn't always do so without pain or discomfort.
